CONSERVING

FOR THE FUTURE

THE CHALLENGE

How can we measure the health of Canada's protected areas?

Ecosystems respond differently to shocks and disruptions brought about by climate change. Recording data on thousands of insect species across Canada's national parks can reveal a lot about the state of these ecosystems.

A STEP IN THE RIGHT DIRECTION

Volunteers and scientists have found more than 725 000 specimens to scan using the Guelph Centre for Biodiversity Genetics' Barcode of Life.

THE RESULT?

Scientists now have a baseline to track long-term shifts in species.

GET INVOLVED

NOW IT'S YOUR TURN

CHRISTMAS BIRD COUNT

Come participate in a Christmas Bird Count, Point Pelee's longest-running citizen science project! For more than 50 years, volunteers have spent a day tallying all the birds they can find.

NATURE, HUMANS, AND HISTORY, OH MY!

Entering the forests of Woodland trail transports you to a wondrous place filled with the sounds of gray tree frogs, woodpeckers and rustling leaves. I love coming here to take a break from bustling city life and to enjoy the sights and sounds of nature, culture and agriculture in Rouge National Urban Park.

WOODLAND NATURE TRAIL

The Woodland Nature Trail has always been one of my favourite spots in Point Pelee National Park, especially in the spring. I can remember walking the long bridges, under the canopy of large trees always hoping to catch a glimpse of the golden swamp warbler, more commonly known as the Prothonotary Warbler, an endangered species that nests in the park.

PERCHED OVER RUSHING WATER

35 metres below your feet, a torrent of water rushes towards Lake Superior. A challenging day hike, paddle or short boat shuttle brings you to Chigamiwinigum Falls. You can hear the water long before you get there, and the view is spectacular!
